

Significance: In this modern era social media has become a part of human life. Many people use social media platforms as their primary source of news and information. Often they don't even bother to check its source and reliability. For this attitude and trust in social media platforms people may develop strong and fixed opinions that are hard to change.

It has become very common nowadays for people to argue about an information in comment section. Often these arguments become conflicts and can turn into serious interpersonal tension. Sometime these conflicts can affect online spaces and influence real life relationships, disturb social harmony and mental health. For example, the tragic death of Abrar Fahad, a BUET student in 2019. He was murdered by the student of the same university over a social media post in which he criticized a political agreement. This incident led to a nation wide outrage and protest (Prothom Alo, 2019). Therefore, it is very important to understand the role social media plays in strengthening fixed opinions and discouraging open dialogue.

The results of this study may help to shed light the way social media platforms personalize feeds and influence to develop bias and fixed mentality. By highlighting these points the research can create greater awareness among social media consumers about their own attitude and information consumption on social media. This awareness will help them to be more cautious in exposure to social media and encourage them to be more respectful while engaging with people online.

In addition, this study can be useful to educators, researchers, and policymakers who are interested in digital literacy and want to reduce polarization among young adults. By understanding the psychological impact many useful steps can be taken to make social media more balanced in exposure to information and more constructive in communicating online.
